Film Theory: An Introduction Through The Senses

Synopsis

What is the relationship between cinema and spectator? This is the key question for film theory, and one that Thomas Elsaesser and Malte Hagener put at the center of their insightful and engaging book, now revised from its popular first edition. Every kind of cinema (and every film theory) first imagines an ideal spectator, and then maps certain dynamic interactions between the screen and the spectator's mind, body and senses. Using seven distinctive configurations of spectator and screen that move progressively from the exterior to the interior relationships, the authors retrace the most important stages of film theory from its beginnings to the present—from neo-realist and modernist theories to psychoanalytic, apparatus phenomenological and cognitivist theories, and including recent cross-overs with philosophy and neurology. This new and updated edition of Film Theory: An Introduction through the Senses has been extensively revised and rewritten throughout, incorporating discussion of contemporary films like Her and Gravity, and including a greatly expanded final chapter, which brings film theory fully into the digital age.

Great book it has been a huge help with my classes

Instead of the usual historical or conceptual organization, the author uses a set of film topos--window, frame, screen, threshold, face, close-up, look, gaze, etc.--to organize another history of film theory. Doing obeisance to a current theoretical shibboleth, there is an obligatory discussion of the body in relation to cinema. I liked the discussion of the window and frame, but the book quickly degenerated into the oneiric obscurity typical of post-modern academic prose. The main problem with such histories is the tendency to make vast generalizations about how films affect individuals, generalizations which ignore the great variety of films and spectators, and which are unverifiable, being merely the abstract fantasies of narcissistic academics.
